The Maritime Arbitration Group of the Institute is pleased to present the following seminar on

Immunity of Classification Societies?

By Capt Lee Fook Choon

Can Classification Societies get away from acts of misrepresentation and negligence?

It is universally recognized that the Classification Societies had made tremendous contribution to safety of life at sea. However, what is not so apparent (perhaps being taken for granted) is that in almost every layer of the shipping industry as a commercial undertaking, the Classification Society plays a uniquely pivotal role. Without which, a shipowner would bring upon himself painful financial and commercial consequences.

In port entry requirements, insurance coverage of ship and cargo, liability coverage, carriage of goods at sea, in ship charters, ship sales, shipbuilding contracts or towing contracts, it is a warranty or even a condition that the subject vessel must be a classed and class maintained vessel or it must conform to a certain classification standard. Such strict and heavy reliance on the certificates issued by the various Classification Societies is overwhelming.

Classification Surveyors are humans and, despite the best of intentions, will have to confront the issues of acts of negligence or even acts of misrepresentation under commercial pressure. What recourse is therefore open to parties who rely on the accuracy and sanctity of Classification Certificates?

Capt Lee will use a few English precedents to examine the duty of care expected from the Classification Societies and the consequences that follow.
